About InsideClimate News

InsideClimate News is a Pulitzer Prize-winning non-profit, non-partisan news organization that provides essential reporting and analysis on climate, energy and the environment for the public and decision makers. We serve as watchdogs of government, industry and advocacy groups and hold them accountable for their policies and actions. Already one of the largest environment newsrooms in the country, ICN is committed to establishing a permanent national reporting network, to training the next generation of journalists, and to strengthening the practice of environmental journalism.

Bringing Back Journalism That's Gone Missing

Dear Reader,

InsideClimate News celebrated its 10th anniversary last November, and our second decade is already off to an auspicious start with good news reaching us two times over.

First, we learned from both the Scripps Howard Awards and the Society of American Business Editors and Writers that they are awarding recognition to our two biggest bodies of work from 2017 – Finding Middle Ground and Choke Hold, both highlighted in this annual report – as well as two other ICN investigations.

Second, the Grantham Foundation gave us confirmation that it will be providing a major grant to help us kick-start the establishment of a national environment reporting network.

Why do we want to build this national network? Because the ecosystem of environmental journalism has been hollowed out in most local markets. Our newsroom may provide safe harbor for talented environmental journalists, but hardly any others are working at news outlets in the vast middle of the country anymore. A dangerous silence has descended on too many communities about profound changes afflicting our natural world.

We see it as part of our mission to revive and embolden environmental journalism so it can spark civic discussion where it's most needed – in the backyards and main streets of everyday America. We have witnessed a great hunger for these conversations that have gone missing in the carnage of the polarization of recent years.

Our non-profit environmental newsroom is the biggest of its kind in the nation. We make the claim proudly even if we have only 15 people. We consistently punch above our weight. We went from start-up to a Pulitzer Prize for National Reporting in five years, and from there doubled our staff while around us journalism was going through a devastating financial crisis. Ours is an improbable story, and an important chapter in the coming of age of non-profit journalism.

Still, both Earth's climate and American journalism are facing a long season of reckoning ahead. The two crises at the heart of ICN's concerns are in worse condition than when we started publishing in 2007. American leadership on climate solutions has been thrown into reverse, and the central role of a free press in American democracy is under attack. Operators, foreign and domestic, are running amok undermining the validity of facts and rational discourse.

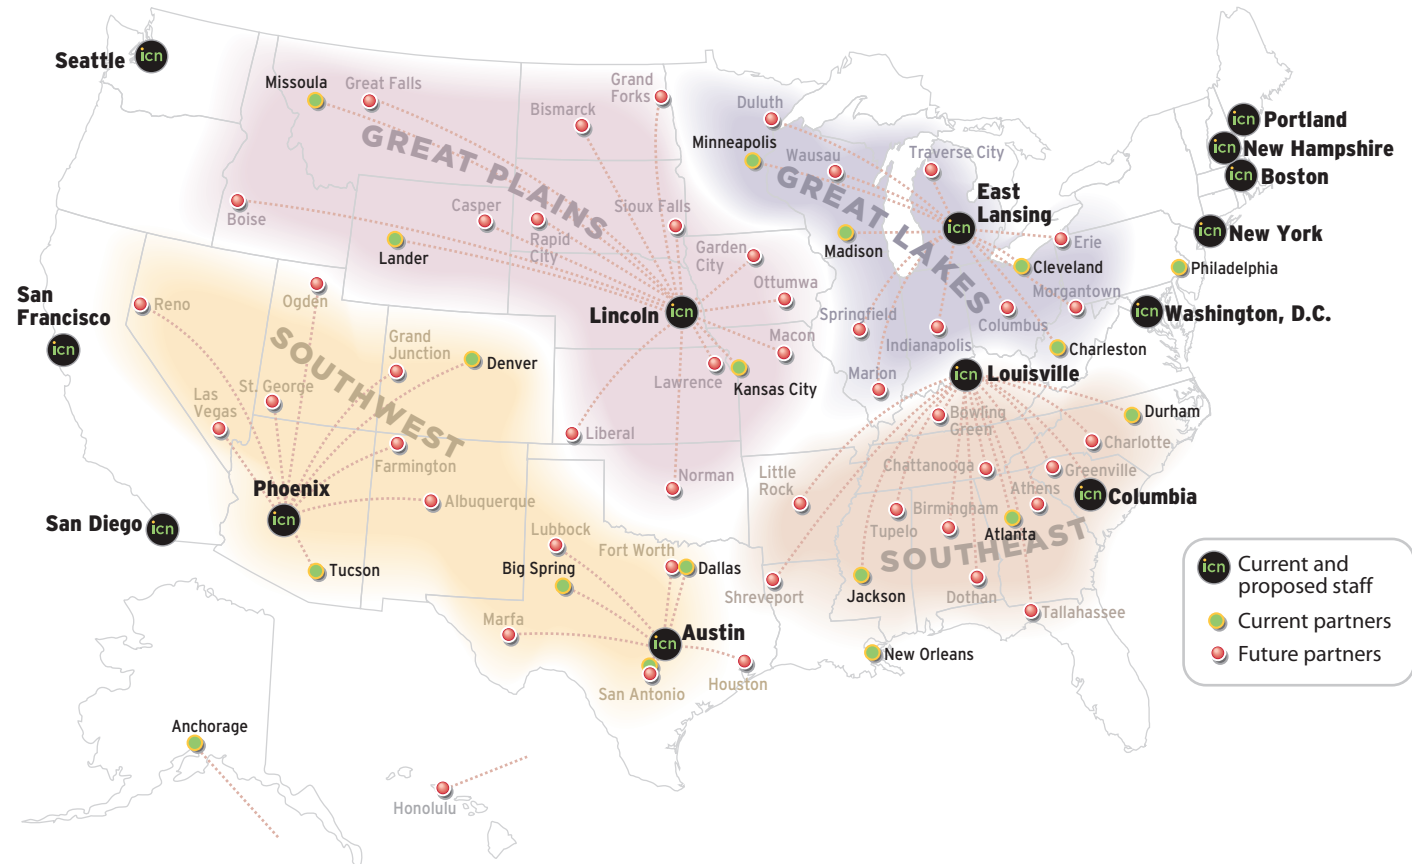

It only means that our work at ICN is as important as ever. It's why, as we continue to produce our journalism and build our reporting network, we are also launching a summer journalism program for high school students. Training the next generation of environmental reporters is part of our mission, too, as we embark on our next decade of journalism in the public interest.

Founder and Publisher, InsideClimate News

How We Are Working to Revive Environmental Journalism

As ICN has grown over the last ten years into one of the nation's largest environmental newsrooms, we have simultaneously witnessed environmental journalism all but vanish from small, trusted outlets in the nation's interior. We are now continuing our work to revive environmental journalism by developing a national environment reporting network and training the next generation of environment reporters.

- National Public Radio reduces its environment team to one reporter
- 37,000 journalists are left working at daily newspapers around the country

Finding Middle Ground

Conversations across America about Climate Change

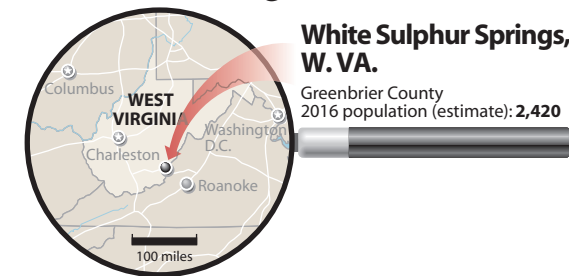

ICN began an important search for an elusive geography in 2017: The middle ground on climate change. Harsh politics and fiercely guarded values made it a risky assignment, but writer Meera Subramanian's talent and humanity provoked revealing conversations across America's heartland. Her lyrical and healing body of work captures the complicated connections that Americans have to the places that sustain them—and just how tangled our notions around climate change can be.

In Georgia's Peach Orchards, Warm Winters Raise Specter of Climate Change

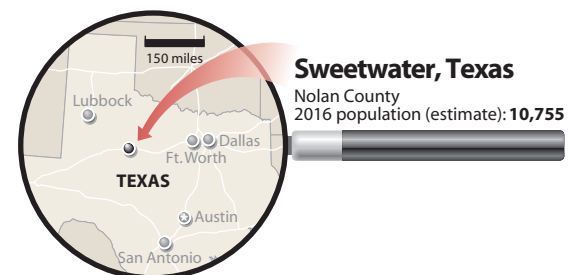

"What was advanced yesterday is no longer advanced today," James Beall said. He sees wind power and its continuing advancements as the future.

Seeing God's Hand in the Deadly Floods, Yet Wondering about Climate Change

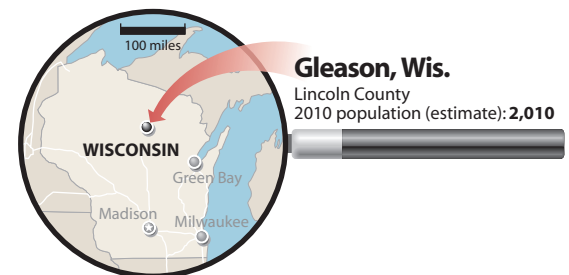

In West Texas Where Wind Power Means Jobs, Climate Talk Is Beside the Point

While Mel Omernick sees the climate changing around her, her father, Ron Behm, is skeptical of any human role in climate change and leans on counter-arguments that scientists say aren't major drivers of the changes.

Our Daily Beats

The Arctic

The Arctic is warming twice as fast as the rest of the world. ICN's Sabrina Shankman — the Lower 48's only fulltime Arctic reporter we know of — is keeping an eagle eye on some of the most powerful climate pollutants, and polluters, in this fragile, melting region at the top of the planet.

Clean Energy

2017 marked a pivotal point in the transition to a clean economy as the cost of solar and wind power declined so greatly they have become competitive with fossil fuel generation. ICN is closely covering this beat. We published 75 stories on the subject last year and launched Clean Economy Weekly to give readers an authoritative round-up of each week's national clean energy news.

Choke Hold

The Fossil Fuel Industry's Fight Against Climate Policy, Science and Clean Energy

For four decades industry encouraged the unchecked acceleration of climate change and left the world with little breathing room to avoid its catastrophic impacts.

Climate Denial: The Long Campaign

The campaign of climate denial has been funded by hundreds of millions of dollars from fossil fuel interests. It is one of the largest, longest and most consequential misinformation efforts ever mounted against accepted science. The campaign has confused public opinion, captured the allegiance of a major political party, and forestalled passage of laws and regulations to address the global environmental crisis caused by the burning of coal, oil and gas.

Our Media Partners

ICN has greatly amplified its reach in 2017 through partnerships and collaborations with over two dozen traditional and new media outlets. Our goal is not only to have more readers of our signature work, but also to have our stories read by the people those stories are about.

Our Funders

We are supported primarily through grants for general support from charitable foundations and also tax-deductible donations from our readers. Donors who support our award-winning environmental journalism have no access to our editorial process or decision-making.

Our institutional donors include:

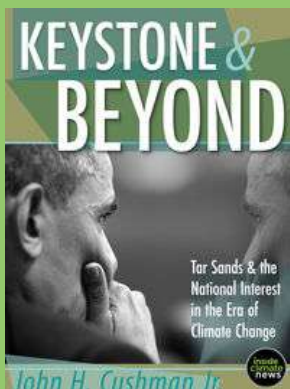

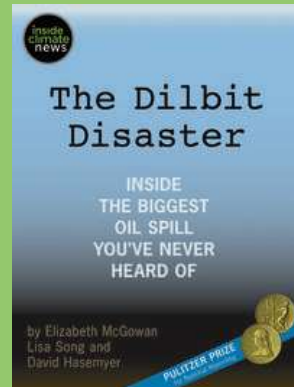

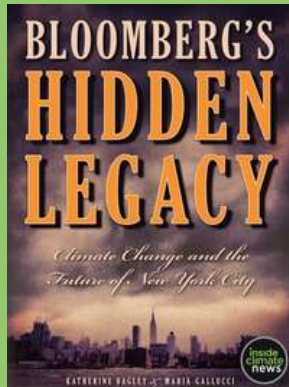

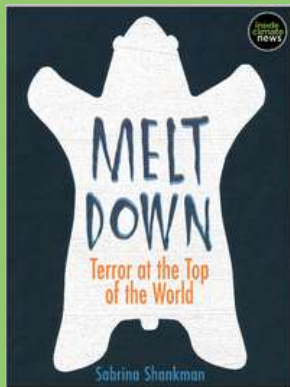

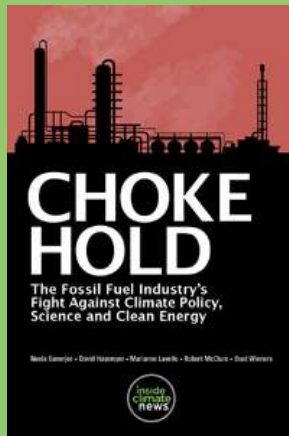

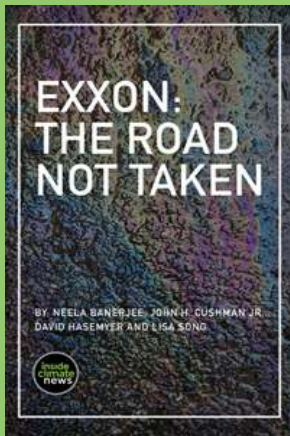

Corporate Sponsors

These sponsors provide financial or in-kind support to ICN. As with our philanthropic and individual donors, they have no access to our editorial decision-making.
